Read more about options.ini inÂ . Researchers aren't sure how common the practice is and what role it plays in the care of cancer patients. But in the case of a young woman with lymphoma, she has been legally deaf since infancy. "It's a medical condition, and it's present from birth," said Katie O'Dell, vice president of advocacy and training at the Susan G. Komen Foundation for the Cure. "And we're not sure how it affects her ability to hear or her quality of life or her ability to access medical care." The woman's case has garnered media attention because the federal government is considering a ban on the use of federal funds for fetal organ donations after birth. Her condition, in this case, is a medical condition that may impact her in the future, and her care would therefore be affected by proposed changes to federal law. The woman's parents had no idea the baby she was carrying might have deafness because they're not from a medical family, and doctors noticed a problem when she was diagnosed with early-onset lymphoma at 18 months old, said Dr. Tom Thomas, who treated the girl at Vanderbilt University Medical Center in Nashville. "We would never have known if her parents hadn't brought it to us," said Thomas, co-director of the hospital's lymphoma program. During the interview, the woman smiled. She wore a necklace with a cross. Her parents, who did not want to be identified, were also with the researchers. One symptom of the woman's disease is hearing loss. Her family doctors and oncologists have questioned her
